Unfortunately, there isn't a single, specific symbol universally recognized as the "Medjay symbol." The Medjay were an ancient Egyptian people known for their roles as police, scouts, and soldiers. While they possessed various iconography associated with their culture and duties, there's no singular image definitively representing them.

Here's what I found about potential connections:

- Scarab beetle: This common Egyptian symbol might be linked to the Medjay due to their desert patrols, as the scarab was associated with protection and rebirth, crucial concepts for those navigating harsh environments. However, it's not exclusively a Medjay symbol.
- Military iconography: Depending on the historical period and context, Medjay soldiers might have worn specific armor, carried unique weapons, or used particular standards with distinct imagery. However, these would likely be specific to their unit or era, not a universal symbol.
- Figurines or depictions: Archaeological finds or artistic representations from the time might showcase the Medjay with specific clothing, tools, or even tattoos that could be interpreted as symbolic. However, their meaning and interpretation can be complex and debated.
