Pennsylvania, officially known as the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is a constituent state of the United States of America. Pennsylvania is the only state named after its founder, William Penn, who intended to title it "Sylvania" (Latin for "woods") because of its widespread forest lands. Being the middle colony of the original thirteen colonies and playing a significant role in the social, political, and economic growth of the United States, Pennsylvania earned the nickname The Keystone State. The center wedge-shaped stone in an arch, that supports all the other stones, is known as the "keystone" in architecture.

It is bordered to the southeast by Delaware, to the south by Maryland, to the southwest by West Virginia, to the west by Ohio, to the northwest by Lake Erie and the Canadian province of Ontario, to the north by New York, and to the east by the Delaware River and New Jersey.

The state capital is Harrisburg, and the largest city is Philadelphia.

The colors of the Pennsylvania state flag are blue and golden and the state flag was officially adopted in 1907. Pennsylvania declared blue and golden as the official state colors.

William Penn, an Englishman and a member of a Christian group called the Quakers, established the British colony of Pennsylvania in 1681. Penn's colony provided religious freedom, which drew people from different denominations. During the French and Indian War, 1754 – 1763, the English and French fought for control of the land. The Declaration of Independence was signed in Philadelphia by the first and second Continental Congresses in 1776. After the conflict, on December 12, 1787, Pennsylvania became the 2nd U.S. state to ratify the U.S. Constitution.
